Attitudes To Premiumisation Post-COVID-19 - Thai Consumer - 2022

This report looks at the following areas:

- How Thai consumers define 'premium'
- Premium product/service categories consumers mostly spend on
- Factors that encourage consumers to pay more for premium products/services
- Added value: functional and emotional benefits in premium brands
- Premium elements that draw in consumers of different demographics
- How to increase premium value: extra benefits and proof of claims
- Opportunities for brands to promote premium products/services in the Thai market

'Premium' connotes quality, feel-good sensations and experiences. Make shopping for premium items fun and incorporate health/eco benefits to drive purchase.

Overview

Over 8 in 10 Thai consumers purchased premium products/services in the past six months. The top categories here are food and drink (40%), goods with health benefits (32%), and beauty and accessories (28%).

As it was in 2020, quality remains the defining feature for premium in 2022. 82% of Thais tend to buy the premium version of a product, and are also on the lookout for value-added benefits. According to Mintel Trend Driver Value, the rising cost of living and inflation are forcing consumers to be more careful with their spending.

As a result of this increased frugality, brands seeking to establish premium positioning will need to demonstrate the exceptionally high value of their products. Nearly half of consumers, for example, are willing to pay more for premium items if they are certified with proven standards and use high-quality ingredients. Further, some 80% of consumers say that they would buy premium products that promise a 'good feeling' (eg make them feel special, boost their self-esteem, or boost their status).

Opportunity exist for premium brands to drive purchase among budget-conscious and value-seeking consumers by demonstrating strong product functionality and enhancing emotional appeal (eg trendy claims, attractive packaging design, limited edition).
