Overview

Snacking continues to rise as a consumer behavior, and now its encroaching on meals. The shifts are led by Gen Z and Millennials, many of whom are at least in some way driven by parenthood: the shift in lifestyle subsequently adds more snacking to the mix. As society generally moves towards a more casual vibe, there is clear blurring between snacks and meals, creating space for BFY to step in as a nutritional solution. Protein content and low sugar are among the top consumer asks, likely because if a snack might replace a meal (or part of a meal), it should be nutritionally similar to more typical mealtime options.

Still, consumers don't necessarily want or need their BFY snacks to be nutritionally perfect; "too healthy" can actually be a red flag, signaling potentially disappointing taste. Small tweaks can protect the enjoyment of snacks while meeting needs related to health and wellness.

As snacking replaces main meals, the BFY snack is critical to meeting nutritional needs. Despite a crowded market, consumers want ideas for BFY snacks that are easy, satiating, and delicious.
