Brand Overview: Food - UK - 2024

This report looks at the following areas:

- The most consumed brands operating within the food sector.
- How leading food brands perform in terms of trust, differentiation, satisfaction and likely recommendation.
- The top-scoring food brands for particular personality traits, including innovation, value, quality and taste.
- The top-scoring food brands on hot topics in the food sector, including natural, indulgence, ethics, and health and wellness

A sharper focus on value and ethics has put food brands under more scrutiny. Healthy eating habits have meant that categories have had to tailor their offerings.

Overview

Familiarity and trust are both huge factors that influence brand consumption in the food category, meaning that established brands often feel a sense of security as market leaders. This ensures great difficulty for challenger brands, who must innovate to stand out. Tapping into changing consumer behaviours and attitudes will help better resonate with consumers and can help build a unique image for brands.

The challenges that have been brought upon by the cost-of-living crisis have meant that consumers are putting more scrutiny on their purchases, and are continuing to look for the best possible value in the food category. Consumers, however, are not only looking for the cheapest options to fit tighter budgets, they are in fact looking to balance price and quality, meaning closer attention is being paid to products and brands in terms of what they can offer.

Consumers are now, more so than ever, expecting authenticity and transparency from brands on ethical and sustainable practices, with many going out of their way to research and explore environmental efforts. Brands that effectively communicate their dedication to producing in a way that match up with consumer morals will appeal to particularly eco-conscious consumers now, but will also be poised to thrive in a more discerning society in the future.
