

IN-STORE BAKERY – US – 2024

Building longer-term loyalty, shopping habits, and growth in the ISB will require a healthy balance of indulgence and meeting everyday needs. Innovation on the menu can create new occasions, but so can getting creative with pairings and merchandising that embraces the full power of the perimeter.

Overview

In recent years, grocery retailers' development of at-home food solutions have demonstrated the power of food-centric offerings and programs that connect with consumers' everyday convenience needs: from value options that fit into tighter budgets to accessible indulgences that bring convenience and comfort in uncertain times. The ISB can be a focal point in the perimeter of the store alongside foodservice-style options that can be brand and traffic builders.

Now, even after boosted dollar sales in 2022 that spilled into 2023, the ISB still faces challenges in building routine, everyday associations. More than a third of in-store bakery consumers agree that ISB products are an impulse purchase, and less than half agree that ISB products are good for everyday groceries. Yet, practical bakery items like breads and buns (perhaps predictably), are what really drive routine engagement. Retailers can push past the limits of special occasion shopping and remind consumers of the ISB's versatility and variety that lends to everyday convenience and quality.

Building longer-term loyalty, shopping habits, and growth in the ISB will require a healthy balance of indulgence and meeting everyday needs. Innovation on the menu can create new occasions, but so can getting creative with pairings and merchandising that embraces the full power of the perimeter.

The ISB does fare well in comparison to other baked goods' shopping locations, but retailers can continue to differentiate and enhance experiences to increase foot traffic, especially with younger shoppers who want more from the ISB. In-store sampling and daily specials are by no means novel ideas, but they are concepts that can bring everyday excitement in a department that needs to break free from being just a special occasion destination.
