This report looks at the following areas:

- Consumers' outdoor recreation and sporting activity participation and interest
- Participation frequency and locations
- Influential sources and primary motivations
- Attitudes toward outdoor recreation and sporting activities

Overview

Outdoor recreation and sporting activities are incredibly popular, with a staggering 83% of consumers participating in at least one such activity. A significant portion of these participants, a noteworthy 55%, engage in these activities on a weekly basis – highlighting their importance in consumers' lives. Looking ahead, consumers – especially younger consumers – are expected to continue participating in these activities and even explore new ones. While this is a positive sign for the category, it also means that brands and retailers must find unique ways to stand out from their competitors. One effective approach is to emphasize affordability and accessibility, as these factors play a pivotal role in attracting consumers. Additionally, highlighting the mental health benefits associated with outdoor activities is a powerful message that will resonate – and align with – consumers' motivations.

Outdoor recreation and sporting activities remain popular, but it will become increasingly important for brands and retailers to combat barriers to access.
