Overview

Pets are a significant part of consumers' lives. Consumers prioritize their pets' wellbeing with many (49%) looking for natural options in their future purchases. This shows that as consumers detox their lives, they are applying the same mindset to the pet supplies they purchase.

While inflation has hit consumers' wallets hard, pet owners remain firm in their purchasing habits. They aren't willing to change what and where they buy, and instead are more actively seeking out coupons and deals in order to maintain their current behaviors. With a focus on budget, brands that offer deals and promotions will seem more attractive to shoppers still wrestling with inflation.

One of the biggest opportunities in the market lies in creating lifestyle products for pets. Consumers want to take their pets wherever they go and have them comfortably participate in various activities (eg hiking, road trips). Brands can expand their product lines to accommodate these needs and assist consumers in having their pets partake as a companion in their activities.

Pets are a significant part of consumers' lives. Consumers' shopping behaviors show how they value their pets and their desire to keep them safe, happy and healthy.
