- Interest in types of wellness holidays
- Consumers' reasons for taking a wellness holiday
- Desired booking methods for wellness holidays
- Perceptions of wellness holidays

Wellness travel has great potential to help holidaymakers release stress and provide them with tools to better cope with uncertainty.

Overview

Wellness travel continues to show incredibly strong growth potential. Nevertheless, consumers' interest in health/wellness holidays is slightly lower than before the cost of living crisis as their expensive image has deterred some travellers. Providers must therefore demonstrate that wellness holidays do not have to be expensive, for example by promoting the benefits of spending time in nature, encouraging digital detox time, promoting lower-cost destinations or offering functional food and drink.

The COVID-19 pandemic has moved to the background and consumers are becoming more upbeat about their finances. However, uncertainty remains as a result of geopolitical tensions, climate change and the widespread adoption of AI. As such, wellness travel has great potential to help holidaymakers release stress and provide them with tools to better cope with uncertainty.

Potential wellness travellers show a strong interest in beach holidays, rural breaks and city trips when going on a wellness holiday. As such, wellness products and services will continue
