Toilet And Hard Surface Care - Germany - 2022

This report looks at the following areas:

- Purchasing responsibilities and usage of toilet and hard surface care, including usage of hard surface care by location
- Purchasing interest in toilet and hard surface care products surrounding local materials, formulations and packaging
- Behaviours and attitudes towards toilet and hard surface care, including importance of product performance and home hygiene, purchasing channels and eco-friendly concepts
- Launch activity and innovation opportunities, including reflection on brand shares and market size

Cushioned by the needs-driven nature of the market, brands can count on continued consumer reach in times of inflation and focus on embracing circular supply chains from local materials.

Overview

70% of toilet and hard surface care users prefer short ingredient lists over long ones. The same share prioritises product performance over all other product attributes. Brands are now facing the dilemma of having to achieve more with less. Stripping formulas down to essentials and tapping into underrepresented free from claims provides one way of satisfying consumers' demands.

This could equally alleviate some of the inflationary pressure since toilet and hard surface care products are exposed to price increases through rising costs on raw materials and supply chain issues. Consumer reach is unlikely to drop given the needs-driven nature, low purchasing frequency and low share on the overall household budget of cleaning products. Regardless, Germans display an overall heightened price sensitivity due to financial concerns. Fading home hygiene concerns further aggravate the threat of consumers downgrading on cleaning products or cleaning frequencies.

Brands can counterbalance these tendencies by turning scrutiny on ingredients into curiosity. Preference for short ingredients greatly stems from rising health and sustainability concerns. Hence, concepts that align with these priorities, such as nature-inspired protective films for greater performance, organic or plant-based disinfectants, or natural polishing aids to avoid microplastics will keep consumers engaged.
