- Behaviours around women's facial skincare, revealing that many women are reluctant to experiment

- Purchase drivers, where active ingredients and long-lasting results outrank price

Proactive skincare prevails, while the economic climate curbs experimentation. Routines boost confidence and relieve stress, which bodes well for future recovery.

Overview

Only 6% of female facial skincare users disagree that catering to skin type is more important than tackling skin issues. This points to a proactive approach to skincare that favours prevention over treatment. However, as the age group most likely to experience visible signs of skin ageing, such as wrinkles/fine lines and hyperpigmentation, women over 55 are more likely to prioritise active ingredients that can achieve visible results.

In a market hit by inflation and declining real wages, category growth continues to be elusive. Market share of own labels decreased in 2022 as women resorted to trusty mass(tige) brands. But as of July 2023, 46% of German women are considering purchasing more own-label beauty products, which bodes well for these brands.

In the current economic climate, there is little willingness to try new things or engage with skincare trends, which has led to a decline in usage of some products. Changing habits and adverse beliefs around makeup impact cleansing frequency.

For many women, their skincare regimes are closely tied to confidence and wellbeing. Those who still earn good money and like to spend it on skincare are more prone to layering products, adding steps to their routines, and experimenting with brands. This allows for a positive outlook for women's facial skincare once the economy bounces back.
